Safety Data Sheets and Labeling and Classification

We Bring Transparency into the Supply Chain

When you market hazardous chemicals and mixtures, you must inform users about the dangers and risks involved through safety data sheets (SDS) and classification labels. This obligation is defined by REACH and the CLP Regulation. And depending on the product and the regulation in force, you must also provide additional instructions for operation and use or data sheets.

It's crucial that all documents always remain up to date. As the distributor, you are responsible for the creation and updating of such materials. We would be happy to perform that work for you and provide the documents to you and your suppliers, and also governmental agencies, and poison control centers, in a database.

PRODUCT SAFETY AT ALL LEVELS

We Provide the Required Documents

To distribute your products globally, you must observe and comply with the requirements of chemicals laws in each country. The crux of the problem is that every country has its own requirements, and the laws are always in flux. The good news is that we are familiar with chemicals laws around the world, we can supply all the required documents for you, and thereby securely ensure access to the market for your products.

It is difficult to obtain an overview of the complexity of international chemicals law. However, as a distributor, you are still obligated to keep SDSs up to date and provide them to your customers at no charge. The labels of industrial, commercial, and consumer products must also transparently provide information on the products' properties – especially about potential hazards and risks.

We not only create SDS in more than 50 languages but also make suggestions for the legally specific part of mono or multilingual labels. If desired, we can inspect your labels and label designs along with those of your partners and suppliers. Because the amount of data required for SDS is constantly increasing, we handle all data management for your suppliers' SDS within the scope of our comfort package „KFT Control & Care“.
